Enterprises use a BI database to allow them to better manage and analyze their data in a single location. The first BI databases were set up in the mid-1990s and aimed to replace legacy business software and traditional databases, but the field has gone from strength to strength in recent years with more recent systems being capable of much more. BI software allows users to create their own views of the data in a BI database, rather than manually manipulating the data within the database or submitting queries to a separate database system. The views can then be stored in a result set to be shared and analyzed more easily with other applications. Types of BI databases Analysis grid These tools allow companies and consumers to observe and analyze the change in patterns of consumer behavior, market trends and customer satisfaction. By analyzing it through dynamic time-series data, consumers,
